Beyond image editing with aesthetic results in mind, Adobe Photoshop is a true professional piece of software. In fact, it's one of the heavy lifting software products (along with Lightroom) used by many graphic communicators and professionals. It's tried and tested and, in the past few years, has grown in functionality, reliability, and stability, to the point where it can handle a wide range of design projects: design, editing, and retouching. It ultimately makes it easier for photographers to do the things they want to do. Better ways to manipulate photos: Adobe SnagIt and Adobe Document Cloud add batch editing tools that make tweaks rapidly. Now, any photo editor can export a selection or a group of selections as a GIF, JPEG, or PNG and then save or share the files. The ability to draw on photographs is nothing new. I used to love doing it with my first Symbian phone, but haven't done it much since. The Apple Pencil is the logical device to make that sort of thing happen more often. It's good to see that Photoshop now has access to Apple's technology. I do believe that Adobe needs to make some improvements, particularly in the way that the Apple Pencil is captured before it can be imported into Photoshop. Not being able to see where in Photoshop you will be dragging from isn't that great. So far it feels as if you just have to trust the app and the pen is captured in a grey box, in a similar manner to the pen-based Illustrator illustrations. You can set the starting position of the stroke and it does start there, but I feel that this could get significantly better. It might be better that Photoshop is not opening to Apple's own view of the artwork at the moment and instead using its own view of the layer. Really, I feel that a layer is faster to work with, since you can both see and move and delete anything on that layer, unlike when you drag things into the layer viewer.
